PIPING PLOVER NESTING AT DIEFENBAKER LAKE, SASKATCHEWAN

by PAUL C. RUMP*

I was most interested to read Wayne Renaud's report on nesting records for the Piping Plover in Saskatchewan, which was published in the September issue of Blue Jay.

I would like to add Lake Diefenbaker as another breeding locality for this species. One of my favourite camping spots is on the west side of the Qu'Appelle Arm of Lake Diefenbaker. In 1974 we visited this sand dune area on the weekend of June 15 and 16. On the 16th, while on a shoreline walk with my family, we discovered two nests of the Piping Plover. The nests, which were about 1/2 mile apart, were located about 2 miles southeast of the former rail point of Aiktow. The nests were within pebble patches on the otherwise sandy beach. Each nest contained four eggs. The eggs were very well camouflaged amongst the pebbles

*3320 Angus Street, Regina, Saskatchewan, S4S 1P8 and we had to wait patiently at a distance for the birds to return to the nest before we eventually pinpointed and found them. At the second nest site, the adult bird went through ar elaborate broken wing display to try to lure us from the nest. This, the camouflaged eggs, and the simple nest were ideal learning experiences for my young children.

SHRIKE CAPTURES BLACKBIRD

by S. O. JORDHEIM*

During the fall and winter month we are visited occasionally by the Nor thern Shrike which preys on Hous Sparrows around the yard. On Octobe 30, 1974. I was surprised to see on ignore the sparrows which were circling in a dense group and give chas to a Rusty Blackbird.

At first the blackbird kept a health lead and did not seem perturbed abou its pursuer, but the shrike ker doggedly on and, when getting close would try to grasp the blackbird whic would then put on a burst of speed an get a lead of 20 to 30 feet. The chas continued around the yard and pastur several times at a height of 25 to 4 feet and, I would estimate, a distand of 2.5 to 3 miles. The blackbird was tiring but the shrike seemed to go stronger making more frequent a tempts to capture his victim. Final the shrike grasped it in the air an both birds plunged to the ground.

I was surprised to see the shrike a tempt to capture an apparently health bird of this size. At no time did the blackbird attempt to get into trees a bushes as the sparrows do.

On another occasion a shrike catured a House Sparrow about 20 fe from where I was standing. It verquickly killed it by biting it in the throat area and then, seeing me, hastiflew away carrying its prey with if feet, the same as a hawk does.
